Begging The Question Thomas P. Lind

Humans in general are dominated by the sensations and thoughts with which they are identified. The repetition of these feelings and thought becomes their beliefs which then control their lives. They don't realize that the feelings and thoughts which arise in their consciousness are fleeting, transient and most cases don't represent anything in reality; they are not factual. More than ninety percent are self-defecting.

This is sad and disturbing, because it leads us to so many erroneous views of life and existence; it's because of this in anger and hatred we kill, we become dope addicts and we defraud others; we war destroying cities and kill without reason or mercy thousands of innocent people. If we stop to think, every war fought was over an ideology.

This book, in its many pages, points to the insight that from moment to moment we are the sum total of the predominant thoughts we allow ourselves to think; we are only what we are experiencing. It holds the keys to transcend from the slime to the sublime, the ordinary to the extraordinary; from the mundane to the Devine. You can open the door to moral and intellectual insightfulness.
