Shattered Dreams Polona Kovac

A dramatic story of two girls, a Bulgarian and a Slovene, who are deceived and sold to a foreign country, used, beaten, and raped. A story of two victims of human trafficking, always trying to survive just one more night in the streets. But even in spite of the tragic circumstances, in which they meet, a true friendship is born, a friendship that makes the days and nights, so full of despair, somehow bearable.

“She didn’t actually believe in their salvation. And even if they got out of there, how would that even help them? She hadn’t been at the doctor’s ever since she came there, and it had probably been even longer for Boyana, for Dmitry was already her second owner. And there was nothing they could say or do to make their clients wear condoms. The client's wish was their command. And none of them actually believed in the possibility of not being infected with a contagious disease of some sort. Sooner or later, they would find themselves on the street or lying in some gutter. But if they did get sick in a way that it became noticeable, he would get rid of them, to prevent his girls from getting a bad reputation. Sometimes Tina actually wanted to get really sick, and get it all over with, for she neither had the courage to finish it herself, nor a hope for a better future.”
